

Banning After-School Programs

By Sarah B.

Are kids stealing items in your desks? I believe that after-school programs shouldn't be allowed to meet at school. Kids move your desks and chairs around which bothers the teacher. Also, the kids use most desks for gluing, dealing with ink and many other possible messy crafts. Lastly, most of the kids who participate in after-school programs at Chickering take items from your desk like Purell and mechanical pencils from inside your personal desk.

The children who participate in after-school programs mess up many kids desks. For example, the youngsters may touch a book inside your desk and then put it in a different spot in your desk. Another possible event that may happen is the kid sitting at your desk will use a pencil from inside your desk, then drop the pencil on the ground even though it was your pencil. That would cause the pencil to be swept away and be picked up by a janitor. Having a group of children meet in my classroom would affect my whole class and would bother the teacher, because kids would mess up the neat desks.

Another qualifying reason why after-school programs shouldn't meet at school is because most or all of the students in the group take or steal many items from inside your desk. Even if you have a pencil case with all your valuable items like erasers or special pencils in there, they will still go rummaging throughout your pencil case. Also, they might use hand sanitizer if you have any in your desk, then decide they want to keep the hand sanitizer because they like it. Some younger kids may be bad and look inside most kids desks and look inside your desk. After- school programs shouldn't meet at school due to kids stealing items.

Kids that come in classrooms after-school shouldn't move items around in classrooms. For example, the students might move your desks and chairs around to how they want it. This will disrupt your classroom and also annoy your teacher. Moving desks around may cause items to fall out from inside your desk. Kids that come into classrooms after school hours will think that there are no rules, but of course there still are. Kids/ students who participate in after-school activities will do many disrupting things like moving desks around which shouldn't be allowed.

Don't you think that having your desks not messed up by the after-school kids would be great? Well I do. Everybody in your classroom will be happier because of the desks the same and not messed up, no items stolen from desks and all desks and chairs in the same spot.
