

Why Colleges should be Open to all Students

By James G.

How would you feel if you weren't accepted to the college of your choice? All students should be allowed to go to the college that they would like because some people need individual help with their classes. If students go to the college of their choice they will get a better job. Young adults will get more confidence when they get into the college they want.

Some people need specialized help and that is one of the reasons why colleges don't accept them. They just need more specific help with some of their classes. One university might offer personal help, but might not be the best choice for you. Institutions of higher education should have more special help teachers, then they would have to accept you.

The more people that go to the college of their choice will get better jobs. It will make the difference in the rest of your life. If someone wanted to go to the higher level of learning but does not get in it could change everything. Just because you need special help could shift your job career.

When you don't get accepted to the school of your choice it breaks down your self-esteem and you could stop learning because they did not accept you. You might not get to be the person you had hoped to be.

Being able to go to the college you want to could change everything in your life. You could become smarter get a better job, and have more self confidence. When you get all that you will be a better person. There are so many people in the world that need special help and don't get in to the college they want so, why don't colleges give people a little bit of special help?
